ROCHESTER

Is an ancient city and port (having separate jurisdiction), locally in the lathe of Aylesford; 29 miles E. S. E. from London, 26 W. N. W. from Canterbury, and 9 N from Maidstone; situated between and adjoining to the towns of Stroud and Chatham, bounded on the west by the river Medway, over which is a handsome stone bridge connecting the city with Stroud. The healthfulness of its situation, the scenery with which it is surrounded, its great thoroughfare, and other local advantages, render it highly important and eligible as a place of trade, and pleasant as one of residence. This city (the Durobrivæ of the Romans, and one of their stipendiary towns), was by the Saxons called Hrooffe-ceastre or Hrove-ceaster, from which its present name is derived. The time when this place was first encompassed by a wall cannot be exactly ascertained: it is conjectured by some to have been originally built by the Romans; and it was Dr. Stukeley's decided opinion, that, at the west end of the north wall, there are rows of Roman bricks; the walls were erected to correspond with the four cardinal points. Amongst a great number of ruins, the castle presents itself as the most prominent -- standing on an eminence of considerable altitude, almost overhanging the river Medway; and must attract the notice and admiration of every lover of the remains of ancient greatness. Its situation was highly favourable for defence; the river secured it from any sudden attack on the west, whilst on the south, east and north it was protected by an extensive ditch. It is supposed (and with great probability), by historians, that the mound on the south may have been cast up by the Danes, when they besieged the city in 884. This castle, from its towering height, may be seen at the distance of thirty miles. The cathedral presents a fine exterior, though its immediate effect is much deteriorated by being environed with houses, without open space sufficient to afford an advantageous view of the whole structure. It is pretty accurately ascertained that the erection of this church was commenced in 1077, and that Henry I was present at its consecration, by Archbishop Corboyl, in 1130. It is upwards of 300 feet in length from the west door to the east wall of the chancel; the east transept is in length, from north to south, 90 feet. The style of the building has an uniform character, and presents a curious specimen of the early English or pointed mode of architecture. The numerous ancient monuments which add interest to the interior of this venerable pile cannot here be particularized; but they are of a nature well calculated to gratify the curious, and reward the antiquary's observation. The other places of worship are the parish churches of St. Margaret and St. Nicholas, and chapels for independents, unitarians, Wesleyan methodists, and the society of friends. Rochester abounds with charities: the first that comes under notice is the endowed grammar-school, founded by Henry VIII, with an appointment for an upper and an under master, and of twenty boys called 'Kings Scholars;' it has exhibitions at Oxford. In 1701 Sir Joseph Williamson founded a free school, for the education of freemen's sons for the sea service; here is also a British school, on Lancaster's system. Besides these there are other charities: St. Catherine's hospital is for poor women; St. Bartholomew's for lepers; Sir J. Hawkins's for disabled seaman; Watts' charity for the relief of six poor travellers, and Hayward's almshouse for poor men and women. A philosophical and literary institution has been established here conjointly with Chatham, having a reading room, library and museum; and the citizens have the advantage of a well conducted journal, the 'Rochester Gazette,' which is published every Tuesday.

The first charter obtained by the inhabitants of Rochester was granted to them by Henry II, and that by which it was governed previous to the passing of the municipal act, was conferred by Charles I; the late enactment vested the government in a mayor, six aldermen and eighteen councillors, with the usual assistant officers, under the title of the 'mayor and citizens of the city of Rochester, in the county of Kent:' the same act divided the city into three wards, and conferred upon it a commission of the peace. Quarter sessions are held for the city; an annual court leet and baron on the Monday after the feast of St. Michael; and a court of requests, at the guildhall (a handsome brick building), the second Friday in every month. The city first sent members to parliament in the 23d of Edward I, since which time it has uninterruptedly exercised the franchise: the mayor is the returning officer; and the present representatives are Ralph Bernal and Thomas B. Hobhouse Esqrs. The trade of Rochester principally arises from the great number of persons employed in the dock yards, private ship building and the oyster factory; over the latter the corporation exercise jurisdiction. An extensive distillery and a large brewery are in the town, and contiguous to it are considerable lime works. The weekly market for general articles of consumption is on Friday, the corn market on Tuesday, and a stock market the fourth Tuesday in every month; the two latter are well attended. The fairs are entitled to be holden on 30th May and 12th December, but they are become of little consequence. The population of Rochester, including its several parishes, the cathedral precincts, part of Chatham within the city, and Stroud-Infra, (part of the parish of Stroud, also within the city), by the parliamentary returns for 1831, amounted to 9,891.

POST OFFICE, 26 High street, Edward Finch, Post Master. -- Letters from London arrive (by the Dover Mail) every night at half-past eleven, and are despatched every morning at half-past two. -- Letters from Maidstone arrive every night at a quarter past eleven, and are despatched every morning at a quarter before three.
